

The Schemes of Colonel Clay

once. . . . Take care of yourself, Wentworth. But I know you will. You always do. Ten per cent is more usual."

He rowed away and left us. As the boat began to disappear round the corner of the island, "White Heather"—so she looked—stood up in the stern and shouted aloud through her pretty hands to us. "Bye-bye, dear Sir Charles!" she cried. "Do wrap the rug around you. I'll send the men to fetch you as soon as ever I possibly can. And thank you so much for those lovely flowers!"

The boat rounded the crags. We were alone on the island. Charles flung himself on the bare rock in a wild access of dependency. He is accustomed to luxury, and cannot get on without his padded cushions. As for myself, I climbed with some difficulty to the top of the cliff, landward, and tried to make signals of distress with my handkerchief to some passer-by on the mainland. All in vain. Charles had dismissed the crofters on the estate and, as the shooting party that day was in an opposite direction, not a soul was near to whom we could call for succor.

I climbed down again to Charles. The evening came on slowly. Cries of seabirds rang weird upon the water. Puffins and cormorants circled round our heads in the gray of twilight. Charles suggested that they might even swoop down upon us and bite us. They did not, however, but their flapping wings added none the less a painful touch of earnestness to our hunger and solitude. Charles was horribly depressed. For myself, I will confess I felt so much relieved at the fact that Colonel Clay had not openly betrayed me in the matter of the commission as to be comparatively comfortable.

We crouched on the hard Craig. About 11 o'clock we heard human voices. "Boat ahoy!" I shouted. An answering shout aroused us to action. We rushed down to the landing place and cooey'd to the men, to show them where we were. They came up at once in Sir Charles' own boat. They were fishermen from Niggarey, on the shore of the fifth opposite.

A lady and gentleman had sent them, they said, to return the boat and call for us on the island. Their description corresponded to the two supposed Grantons. They rowed us home almost in silence to Seldon. It was half-past 12 by the gate house clock when we reached the castle. Men had been sent along the coast each way to seek us. Amelia had gone to bed, much alarmed for our safety. Isabel was sitting up. It was too late, of course, to do much that night in the way of apprehending the miscreants, though Charles insisted upon dispatching a groom, with a telegram for the police at Iverness, to Fowls.

Nothing came of it all. A message awaited us from Lord Craig-Elachie. To be sure, saying that his son had not left Glen-Elachie lodge; while research the next day and later showed that our correspondent had never even received our letter. An empty envelope alone had arrived at the house, and the postal authorities had been engaged meanwhile, with their usual lightning speed, in "investigating the matter." Cesarine had posted the letter herself at Fowls, and brought back the receipt; so the only conclusion we could draw was this—Colonel Clay must be in league with somebody at the post-office. As for Lord Craig-Elachie's reply, that was a simple forgery, though, oddly enough, it was written on Glen-Elachie paper.

However, by the time Charles had eaten a couple of grouse and drunk a bottle of his excellent Rudesheimer, his spirits and valor revived exceedingly. Doubtless he inherits from his Boer ancestry a tendency toward courage of the Batavian description. He was in capital feather.

"After all, Sey," he said, leaning back in his chair, "this time we score one. He has not done us brown; we have at least detected him. To detect him in time is half-way to catching him. Only the remoteness of our position at Seldon castle saved him from capture. Next set-to, I feel sure, we will not merely spot him, we will also nab him. I only wish he would try on such a rig in London."

But the oddest part of it all was this, that from the moment those two people landed at Niggarey, and told the fishermen there were some gentlemen stranded on the Seamen's island, all trace of them vanished. At no station along the lake could we gain any news of them. Their maid had left the inn the same morning with their luggage, and we tracked her to Inverness; but there the trail stopped short, no spoor farther. It was a most singular and insoluble mystery.

Charles lived in hopes of catching his man in London.

But for my part, I felt there was a show of reason in one last taunt which the rascal flung back at us as the boat receded: "Sir Charles Vandrift, we are a pair of rogues. The law protects you. It persecutes me. That's all the difference."

"Cheer up; it may not be true"

Aren't most of those troubles that weigh upon your mind imaginary ones? Even though they be real, time will obliterate them. The American people, overworked and high-strung, are given to worrying over little things. Cheer up. Banish care.

Drink Fisher Beer

It tones up and invigorates and helps one to look upon the bright side of life. It brings health, and health is the foundation of cheerfulness. There are no jollier people in the world than those who use a moderate amount of beer.
